

Critical Mass: Why Adam Moskowitz is Starting His Own Firm

Adam Moskowitz explains why he's leaving Kozyak Tropin & Throckmorton.

By Amanda Bronstad

Moskowitz Discusses New Beginnings

After 25 years, it might not be too surprising that plaintiffs' attorney Adam Moskowitz has decided to leave Kozyak Tropin & Throckmorton to start his own firm — but his reason might surprise you.

“Three years ago, I just stopped drinking alcohol because I couldn't handle it. It was a decision I had to make where I had to take responsibility for my life because I have three children, a wife and a career I love,” he told me. Now, he said, he was “properly equipped” to go off on his own.

Here's Law.com's story on his new firm, The Moskowitz Law Firm in Coral Gables, Florida. Moskowitz has settled more than 30 nationwide class action cases against banks and insurers, and he's co-lead counsel in the multidistrict litigation in New Jersey over FieldTurf.

“I just needed to make the jump,” he told me. “It's scary. I've lost sleep. Not that it's easy, but it's exciting, because it's something I'm going to build with my new traditions — my healthy traditions.”